Fiumicino City Council's approval of the proposal to redefine the boundaries of the Reserve adjacent to Fiumicino Airport is undoubtedly an important first step in supporting the development of an airport that aims at reaching 100 million passengers in coming years, contributing to the growth of the capital. It's clear that for a hub to evolve, it must combine development with a strong focus on environmental protection, and so it is positive that the new project envisions net-zero environmental impact and the creation of a large archaeological park. Not to mention the upgrading of the road network serving the airport, starting with the A91 Rome-Fiumicino slip roads, which must be accompanied by the essential upgrading and modernisation of rail links. These works will improve the visitors' experience and the quality of transport for the local community.
