

“Open, transparent and regulated markets are essential for economic growth, consumer protection and innovation. These issues take on an even more concrete significance for our city, for a city like Fiumicino, which is home to the country's main airport, Leonardo da Vinci Airport. The airport is not only a strategic infrastructure for national and international mobility, but also a driver of economic and social development and employment for our region and for the entire metropolitan area of Rome. In this context, the issue of competitiveness in air transport becomes fundamental. Ensuring a level playing field among operators, facilitating market access and promoting the efficiency and quality of services means not only strengthening the Italian airport system, but also improving the experience of the millions of passengers who pass through our airport every year. At the same time, we need to combine the development of air transport with environmental sustainability, technological innovation and harmony with the local area. For an airport city like ours, this balance is a daily challenge that requires constant dialogue between institutions, industry operators, local communities and academia.”
